An exchange advises editors to go into politics on their own account. It states that they have been making political bosses all these years and now they should go in and become bosses themselves. We doubt the propriety of editors doing this. To be sure, they have often helped to elevate others less worthy than themselves to prominence in politics, but the closer attention the editor pays to the running of his paper the better. He can support his party and assist in politics, but when he attempts to "run" things he loses much of the influence his paper might otherwise have. The politician should be made to understand that newspaper space is merchandise just the same as the dry goods and groceries he buys, and when he understands that, he will always be willing to give value received for what the editor does for him. We do not mean by this that a paper should be governed in its principles, or advocacy of principles, by money considerations, but that in assisting those who believe in its principles, he is rendering a service that is worth something to the man thus aided, and should be paid for. Such a course would not come under the head of bootlegging—it is business.
